Sacred Sites and Pilgrimage Routes In the Kii Mountain Range

After leaving Okinawa, Momo was revisiting Nara Prefecture.

Honestly, Momo wanted to return home in Tokyo because of homesickness. But she had already bought a round-trip ticket for the airplane.

When she had come to Nara last time, the autumn leaves of the trees had turned red or yellow.

This time Momo had been welcomed by the snowy landscape.

“Bow-wow! Sooo beautiful!”

Momo’s destination was “Sacred Sites and Pilgrimage Routes In the Kii Mountain Range,” one of the World Heritage Sites in Japan.

The routes seemed to stretch over three prefectures; Wakayama, Mie, and Nara.

Momo heard that it was so severely cold that it would become very tough mountaineering in winter.

The season had passed the peak of the winter, and the scenery was covered with snow.

“I’m not sure if I can bear it, but ... Still, I’ll try!”

Since she was sensitive to the cold, Momo had decided to be heavily clothed.

When arriving at Yoshinoyama Station of the Yoshino Ropeway, Momo was surprised by the beautiful scenery of snow-covered Mount Yoshino in front of her.

The sunlight seemed to reflect off the snow, making it even whiter. The red torii (sacred Shinto gate) also stood out.

She had come to a tourist information center to ask about how to walk around the World Heritage Sites.

A female clerk kindly told her that it would be convenient for her to take a cable bus.

After riding the Yoshino-Omine cable bus for about 30 minutes, Momo had reached Yoshino Mikumari Shrine standing near the summit.

According to the talkative bus driver, a god of water had been worshipped in the shrine.

Then, one middle-aged female tourist walked to her and said:

“Hey, cute doggie! Are you alone? Let me take your picture!”

Momo nodded with a smile.

“Say cheese!”

When sitting still to have her picture taken, she felt it was severely colder.

After leaving Yoshino Mikumari Shrine, Momo moved in Mount Yoshino to Kinpu Shrine. Amid the snowfield, the ancient building was standing solemnly. Momo stopped on its wooden deck, felt a chill through her paws, and was staring at the scenery. The picturesque scenery was reflected in her pupils. At the time, she heard some footsteps approaching. “Oh, hey! Shiba dog! Having a good time? Welcome to Yoshino!” It was a group of training monks who greeted her cheerfully while exhaling white breath. Despite the cold temperature, the training monks were walking quickly. They were all in white clothes and melted in the snow scenery. “They’re cool! Like a ninja!”

Momo was visiting the Kimpusen-ji temple in Mount Yoshino.

It was covered with snow and glittering in white under the sunlight.

Momo was so impressed by the beautiful contrast with the blue sky.

“It looked like a jewel box! Twinkling and fascinating!”

The snow-covered scenery, which was making Momo happy, seemed to be filled with pink of sakura (cherry blossom) in spring.

Momo hoped she would come back here again during the period.

As the snow was falling thick and fast, it was getting dark.

Momo almost lost her way but finally got to Yoshimizu Shrine in Mount Yoshino.

When Momo put her paws together to pray for the shrine, a beautiful miko (shrine maiden) was walking toward her.

“Hi, lovely doggie. We have a power spot (holy place) where you can purify yourself. Want me to bring you there?”

Since it sounded interesting, Momo followed her.

Then, in front of an old gate named Hokketsu-mon, the miko began cutting the air with her fingers horizontally and vertically in turns while shouting a spell.

“Rin! Byo! Tob! Sha! Kai! Zin! Retsu! Zai! Zen!”

Momo bowed to the gate and felt herself being purified by some mysterious power.

At Yoshimizu Shrine, Momo had experienced the sacred Shinto ritual.

The miko, who had purified Momo, asked her.

“Then, Momo-chan, where do you plan to go next?”

Momo recalled her next destination and answered.

“I would like to visit Mount Omine. Sister, can you tell me how to get there?”

The miko frowned, clouded her face, and showed her regret.

“Oh, I’m sorry, but females are forbidden to enter the mountain.”

Momo was shocked and disappointed.

The miko sympathized with Momo and showed her a picture of the mountain.

The miko showed Momo another picture.

It seemed to be a photograph of Omine Okugakimichi, a historic mountain trail in Mount Omine connecting Yoshino with Kumano.

“Momo-chan, look. These kanji characters can be read as ‘Nyonin Kekkai.’”

“Nyonin Kekkai?”

“It indicates the area where females are not allowed to enter.”

But Momo thought she would feel like getting through the gate if it appears in front of her.

Why do dogs want to get through a gate?

You know, because there is a gate.

Momo walked on Omine Okugake-michi (a famous pilgrimage road), where females could enter, and got to Kumano Hongu Taisha.

The shrine seemed to be called “Kumano Sanzan,” along with her next two destinations: Kumano Hayatama Taisha and Kumano Nachi Taisha.

Momo heard that the word “Kumano Sanzan” meant “three precious, sacred places in Kumano.”

So, while walking on the mountain path, Momo was thinking about her own three precious, sacred things.

The answers that she came up with were as follows:

- 1. Taking a meal
- 2. Taking a nap
- 3. Taking a walk

And then, World Heritage Sites, of course!

“... Oh, which means have four in total.”

Momo was visiting Kumano Hayatama Taisha, one of “Kumano Sanzan” (the three prestigious places in Kumano).

Momo met a local guide, who told her about the exciting history of Kumano.

Female Buddhists called Kumano-bikuni seemed to have once traveled all over Japan to propagate the faith for Kumano shrines.

Since Momo had also been traveling around the country, she wanted to contribute to something related to the World Heritage Sites.

What will the people in the future be talking about Momo in 50 years or a century?

“I cannot stop being excited!”

One day Momo was visiting Kumano Nachi Taisha, one of “Kumano Sanzan” (the three prestigious places in Kumano).

Momo was welcomed by weeping cherry trees (or Shidare-zakura in Japanese).

Luckily, the weather was beautiful, and cherry blossoms were at their best.

Also, the vermilion of the building contrasted sharply with the green of the trees.

“Spring has come! Spring has come! Here in Nara!”

Momo was smiling happily without realizing it.

Momo was walking around the Seiganto-ji temple, standing right next to Kumano Nachi Taisha.

There are many waterfalls in Mount Nachi. The waterfall falling on the right side facing the front of the temple is the tallest one called “First Waterfall.”

It used to be threatened to dry up due to landslides, deforestation, and water pollution, but thanks to the conservation efforts of the local people and the cooperative efforts of many others, the beautiful waterfall can still be seen today.

The World Heritage Sites are beautiful because the people who protect them are beautiful, Momo felt.

After walking around the Seiganto-ji temple, Momo was approaching Nachi Falls (or Nachi-no-taki in Japanese).

The waterfall was falling vigorously from a height of 133 meters, and its spray flew at Momo.

In the sunny and warm weather, a pleasant shower fell on her.

I felt so good!

After being soothed by the splashing water of Nachi Falls, Momo decided to take a walk around Mount Kumano.

She met a group of mountaineers who enjoy trekking through the primitive forest of Nachi.

“Hello, doggy. Would you like some coffee?”

Momo didn’t like the bitter taste, so she asked for hot milk.

Then, she took a rest with them in the shade of a big tree named “Horuto-no-ki.”

They said “Horuto-no-ki” meant “tree of Portugal.”

It didn't seem to be native to Portugal, though.

One day Momo was visiting the Fudarakusan-ji temple.

Ancient people seemed to talk about Fudarakusan or Mount Potalaka, where they believed Guanyin (Bodhisattva) descended.

Moreover, not a few of them actually departed for the place by boat.

Momo found a model of their boats being displayed in this temple.

She was moved by the fact that they had set sail for the uncertain destination.

Climbing down from “Kumano Sanzan,” Momo was visiting a sightseeing spot by the sea.

This area seemed to be called Oni-ga-jo (meaning “Demon’s Castle”).

Momo was frightened by the imagination of some Oni (or demon).

At the time, she found a rock with a similar appearance to a lion.

Momo heard it was ‘Lion Rock’ (‘Shishi-iwa’ in Japanese), serving as Komainu (guard dogs for Shinto shrines) for the Ohma shrine nearby.

So cool!

When she was trying to take a photograph, Momo lost her balance because of the strong sea breeze.

Eek!

While Momo kept walking along the shore after passing by Lion Rock, the road was getting gradually narrower.

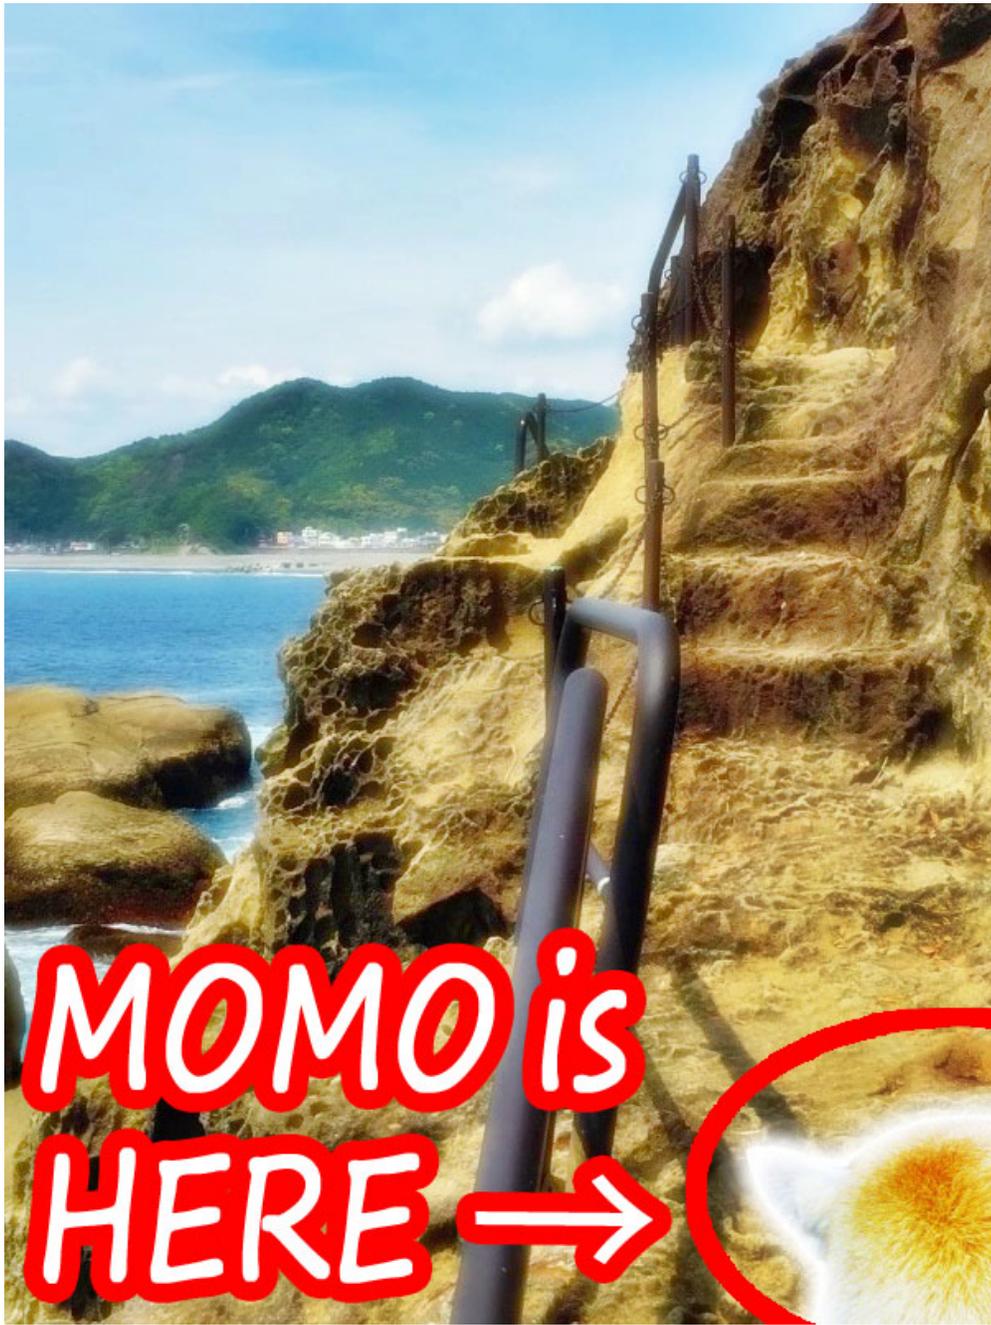

Momo noticed she was walking on the top of precipitous cliffs.

Although railings were installed along the road, it was so scary that Momo couldn't stop shivering.

At the time, she was spoken to by one sea gull, flying toward her.

"Hello, Shiba-dog. This place is called 'Inu-modori', meaning even dogs will turn back because of the fear. Are you okay?"

Momo cried, "I didn't know that! Help meeee!!"

After turning back at “Inu-modori” in the Shichiri-mihama beach, Momo was walking toward the north.

According to the seagull, the road was leading to Ise Grand Shrine (or Ise Jingu in Japanese).

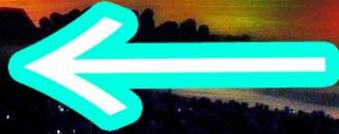

She wanted to visit the shrine, if possible. But, imagining a steep path of a ria coast continuing on and on, she didn't dare to go. Momo was sorry and a little depressed.

The seagull flying in the air near Momo cheerfully encouraged her.

“Don't look downward, Momo-chan! A large fireworks display will be held here tonight!”

After leaving “Kumano Sanzan,” Momo had decided to head for Mount Koya.

Local people advised her to take a train on the Wakayama Line and change trains at Hashimoto Station to the Koya Line.

The train that climbed from Hashimoto Station to Mount Koya seemed to have the nickname “Tenku” (meaning “heavenly sky”).

The scenery was passing fast on both sides.

Momo thought this dreamy feeling was exactly ... “Tenku”!

Momo was visiting the Jison-in temple in Mount Koya.

Mount Koya seemed to have many places not allowing females to enter. Still, Momo heard the Jison-in temple was famous for successful matchmaking for women.

When putting her paws together, Momo was spoken to by someone from somewhere.

“Momo-chan, Momo-chan.”

She looked back and found lots of Jizō (stone statues of Buddhist monks) with red hats on their heads.

“Hey, Momo-chan! You can make your dream come true by writing your wish on this Ema (small wooden plaque).”

They told her it was particularly called “Oppai Ema” (“oppai” means “breasts”).

Momo found herself blushing with embarrassment.

While walking on Mount Koya, Momo was kindly spoken to by many travelers.

However, for some reason, they called her “Gon-chan.”

Why do they call me “Gon”?! I’m Momo, though.

“Hey! Sorry, Momo. Gon is my name, actually.”

Someone said so, and Momo looked for the owner of the voice.

It was a statue of a male dog standing beside that of Kobo-Daishi (legendary Buddhist monk).

One traveler told her Gon had been famous as a guide dog in Mount Koya.

Momo was visiting Niukanshofu Shrine in Mount Koya.

In the precincts of the shrine, an unusually huge Ema, which was as tall as two meters, attracted the visitors' attention.

She saw two dogs painted on the Ema. White one and black one.

People told her that they were the legendary dogs that seemed to guide Kobo-Daishi here, Mount Koya.

Come to think of it, the Eto (Earthly Branches) of the year 2018 was “dog.”

Momo thought it was destiny because she could encounter great dogs such as Gon and these legendary ones.

Momo was visiting the Kongobu-ji temple in Mount Koya.

It was the final destination of her tour to visit the World Heritage Sites titled “Sacred Sites and Pilgrimage Routes in the Kii Mountain Range.”

The towering vermilion pagoda was standing out clear against the blue sky.

It might have been a god of dogs ...

So, what should I go next?

Momo’s journey was still going on.
